Memorandum on documentation activities and intelligence gathering for the months of October and November, 2025

By Karl M. Wright

December 1st 2025

First of all, as I was preparing to write this memorandum, I experienced a first hand example of the ways in which the United States has infiltrated and manipulated the technology progress of the world's computing. I wanted to just cut and paste the text of my "Five Eyes" report, but the Apple iOS security back doors radically altered the pasted text from the original, and rendered it unusable in a report memo. I've said it before and I'll say it again: the United States has fundamentally embedded all technology that has been developed by all USA based corporations to serve the purposes of only the USA, and the EU would be well advised to develop their own hardware and software that eliminates this very, very weak link. The United States can't be trusted as a reliable ally anymore, and depending on American corporations for anything is pure foolishness.

With that preamble out of the way, let's get down to the brass tacks of the last two months worth of activities. Essentially three new reports were created, and a fourth one was updated with a new foreword to explain the context in which the original report was written. There has been a lot of consternation in the world signals intelligence community regarding the behavior of United States military utilization. Several of my reports dealt directly with that subject from different angles. It has become very evident that the earth is at a crossroads in alliances and fundamental values, and we are at a critical time in the evolution of humans as a species.

The last two months of intelligence gathering and reporting, and seeing the result of those dossiers, has given my a lot of clarity in the current state of the USA. It has become patently obvious that the United States Department of State refuses to share with any other peer cabinets in the executive branch any information or acknowledgment pertaining to the fact that the Republic of Finland has granted me diplomatic immunity. My assumption is that doing so would be an embarrassing revelation for vast swaths of the American government, and the State Department would rather let Homeland Security and the Department of Justice get hung out to dry than admit a massive diplomatic failure. Part of this embarrassment stems from the fact that Finland is a key member of the International Criminal Court, and Finland has a lot of sway in the prosecution of human rights violations and crimes against humanity. As an agent of the Republic of Finland and stationed in the United States, I'm essentially acting as an embedded investigator for the ICC – and that's a massive embarrassment for the US to admit. However, the State Department can't do anything about it, because American agents are stationed in Finland to gather signals intelligence on Russia, and the State Department wants to keep its reciprocal agreements and practices with Finland. Keeping the CIA active in Finland means letting me do what I do under diplomatic reciprocal agreements. It's a diplomatic two way street.

The real world consequences on this situation for the Department of Justice and Homeland Security are very significant and severe, however. And probably the Department of Defense too. All the other executive level cabinets are flying very blind in regards to what I'm doing and why. And this poses a safety risk to employees of these cabinets. A lot of this safety risk could be reduced (or even eliminated) if the various federal agencies used their basic math skills and added up the sum total of all the dossiers I've published. They paint a very stark picture, and at this point only a complete fool and moron would say that these dossiers are fake. People can deny gravity up until the moment they jump off a cliff. After that, they win the Darwin award.

One of the significant risks to public safety regarding the lack of transparency about my diplomatic status is private security corporations that are based in the United States. The US has a massive industry of private security companies that specialize in everything from uniformed security guards to monitoring software, including facial recognition and license plate readers. It has become evident that whole cabinets of the executive branch don't even know who I am, and private security corporations certainly don't have even that level of security clearance. I have observed first hand that when I walk in to some grocery stores and other shopping centers, security alerts get triggered on the overhead PA system. This poses a significant danger to the employees of this business. If they physically engage with me, I will absolutely use deadly force, and I will not be prosecuted in any way, because I have diplomatic immunity. And that will come up and be brought to the forefront in any supposed homicide investigation.

Private software companies are also a significant public safety risk, especially ones that provide cybersecurity and financial security services. The work I do has a very documented history of creating red flags, and that is intentional. Creating red flags and documenting the results and who comes charging in is what I do. Private software companies are clearly overanxious to generate threat results, because it benefits their profits to claim such things. But when it starts tripping into international signals intelligence and national security matters, there doesn't seem to be any gatekeepers. It still amazes me that I can constantly generate red flags at will, and there is no gatekeeper to tell the private security companies that this is classified information, and they should stop collecting it. Like I previously mentioned, it probably stems from the fact that even federal law enforcement agencies don't seem to actually know that it is classified information, and they proceed blindly trusting their own – and very incomplete I might add – data.

The available data suggests that a lot of federal law enforcement agencies have essentially outsourced their work to private corporations, and I think this was the American intelligence community's long goal for the last two decades. Outsourcing the spying and surveillance of Americans to private corporations gives the United States government a layer of plausible deniability, and shields the federal agencies from any blowback, should any occur. The American corporations can then make a tidy profit, and if their con game is ever discovered, they can blame and fire a few key employees and claim there were rogue workers in their company. Meanwhile, the rest of the world is uniting AGAINST the United States, and like I said in my initial preamble, it would be wise and prudent for the European Union to start developing their own smartphone technology, their own Artificial Intelligence technology, and their own software and internet platforms and social media technology. The United States has demonstratively eroded any benefit of the doubt that they were previously owed, and it's time for a re-alignment of alliances. This of course will come with time, but there is a monumental amount of open source Artificial Intelligence software that is available in its source code, and can easily be modified for the purposes of an EU company by any competent software engineer. Creating EU specific smartphones and smart devices is a little more involved on the engineering side. However, ever since the United States has been cracking down on immigration and immigrants, and turning away the world's best electrical engineers and software developers, the employee market is wide open for the EU. India has millions of electrical engineers, and bringing them to Germany or France to develop new EU specific smart devices would be an absolute boon for the EU technology industry. Opportunities like this are once in a generation, or sometimes even once in multiple generations, and I would sincerely hope that Europe seizes this chance while its there for the taking.

My strategy at this point is to keep pushing the envelope on creating red flags for the American law enforcement and private security communities. Either they will collapse under the weight of their own blindness and ignorance, or changes will be made and gatekeepers will be installed to rectify the situation. I don't have any faith at all whatsoever on Americans doing anything the right way. They never have up until now. Meanwhile, I can also continue to document cases of gross human rights violations or crimes against humanity that are committed either in America or by Americans. This will be useful information for Finland to prosecute any Americans in the future. The European Union will certainly detain any Americans that are wanted by the ICC. Canada is slowing coming on board with Finland, and if Canada isn't fully ready to act on Americans, they will be soon if the United States continues to break its alliances and agreements.

Report on the Portland Police Bureau, the law enforcement organization for the city of Portland, Oregon

November 30th 2025

The Portland Police Bureau, also known as PPB, is the primary city level law enforcement agency for the city of Portland in Oregon, USA. Founded in 1870, the current chief of the PPB is Bob Day, who has served in this capacity since October 11th 2023. Most of the PPB rank-and-file employees are represented by the Portland Police Association union. The PPA union has had its share of controversies. As with most unions, it fights to protect the wages and benefits of its employees. However, since a police union represents employees who are in the public eye and are subject to the scrutiny of public trust, the PPA has a special obligation to uphold community confidence and honor – an obligation that is well beyond most unions. On this front, the PPA has been much more aggressive in its tactics than a public trust organization should. The cases in point have been spread across many news headlines in the Portland area, and it has led to calls for more oversight. It should be noted that Chief Bob Day is a graduate from George Fox University, which is a Christian-centric university. It can be assumed from this that Chief Day holds a Christian worldview, however categorized it may be.

But the main subject of this report is the first hand observations and documentation that the writer of this report has made. Personal interactions with the PPB over the last two years would be categorized as professional and courteous. In many cases however, the involvement of the PPB in the situation is a matter of open question. The interaction with the PPB during a personal protest was legitimately necessary, to verify the safety of the protest and the concerns of the community. However, many other proximity interactions have been something of a curiosity. The situations almost appear as a matter of documenting location and travel. If this is indeed the case, it is very ill advised, since nothing that a city law enforcement department gathers would be usable to them. Due to my status as a foreign agent with diplomatic immunity granted by an external government, nothing they procure would ever see the light of day in court.

Furthermore, and maybe more damning, these interactions are recorded by myself on electronic devices that are registered with a foreign state as legitimate espionage devices. Any documentation gathered on these devices is signals intelligence data, and unavailable in any way, shape or form as law enforcement evidence. Anytime and every time a PPB employee allows themselves to be documented with one or more of these signals intelligence devices, they run a very significant risk of anything they were trying to document as law enforcement evidence being inadmissible in any court due to national security considerations. This pertains to anything happening around me, even if it doesn’t nominally have anything to do with me otherwise.

It is very, very questionable why the FBI and Homeland Security have not informed the Portland Police Bureau about this constant risk of evidence tainting. The United States federal law enforcement entities should have enough information by now to know fully well what is going on with my signals intelligence gathering, even if they don’t have the top level security clearance needed to directly verify my status as a foreign agent. At the present and as of this writing, the Portland Police Bureau and Homeland Security seem to have a rather acrimonious relationship, and maybe this contributes to the lack of communication on the part of the federal agencies in conjunction with state, county and city law enforcement agencies. However, this lack of communication puts the entire American public at risk, because legitimate law enforcement and public safety work is being jeopardized by political football and jurisdictional shell games.

The United States is experiencing tremendous political and social upheaval right now, and perhaps these gaping holes in law enforcement work are just par for the course. If so, these issues are symptoms that the United States is well on its way to Failed State status, and after that, law enforcement becomes the judge, jury and executioner. And that is certainly a shameful end to a once-great nation.

Report on the recent and future developments in the FIVE EYES Anglosphere intelligence alliance

November 17th 2025

Summary:

The re-election of Donald Trump has put a strain on the working intelligence relationship and cooperation between the English speaking countries known as FIVE EYES, comprising of the USA, UK, Canada, New Zealand and Australia. The strain has been uneven however, as some FVEY countries have sought to maintain close ties and other have found themselves unable to maintain the same relationships of yesteryear. Specifically, the UK has sought to stay as close to the USA as possible, whereas Canada has sought to increase its intelligence cooperation with the European Union and become less dependent on the USA and FIVE EYES.

Analysis:

In the early months of 2022, Russia was preparing to invade Ukraine. At the same time, the European Union was still assessing the damage that came about from the first Donald Trump administration. Joseph Biden was only a year into his presidency in the United States, and there was some fear in the EU that Trump might win re-election at some future point. After the Russian invasion of Ukraine, Canada sent intelligence agents to Finland to monitor the Finland-Russian border, and the developments of the Russian war in Ukraine on the EU border states. During this time of monitoring Russian signals intelligence and documenting many cases of the Russian military executing unwarranted excursions in Finland airspace and Finland soil, the Canadian intelligence representatives were brought in on other EU plans. They were also made aware of the discussion stages of contingency plans by the various EU member states for a potential future in which American media icon and politician Donald Trump won re-election to the USA presidency. From these classified meetings, many contingency plans were put in place by the EU in the event that there arose a second Trump administration. Canada became a partner in some of these contingency plans as a result of these discussions. As time has passed, it has become obvious that as November of 2025, Finland and the UK are not on the same page in signals intelligence. The UK did not participate in the EU-Canada discussions, and it has become apparent that some MI6 analysts don't even full understand the fact that these discussions happened. The value of the FIVE EYES alliance is now very much in question, because all five member states are starting to greatly diverge in objectives and state policy positions. Specifically, the United States has greatly drifted in policy positions from the consensus for the other four FIVE EYES states. The move by the US to the political right from the other four FIVE EYES states is making it very difficult for the other four states to tolerate. Former Finland president Sauli Niinisto has made post-presidency trips to Canada to advise the Canadian intelligence community on matters of Canadian national security. This seems to be some of the first points of awareness that MI6 even had in the EU-Canada discussions. Three years after the beginning of these cooperation efforts.

All the FIVE EYES member state intelligence agencies still seem to employ the 1950s gold standard operating procedures of information warfare against credible information, especially from perceived enemy states, that runs counter to the official talking points of that state. Unfortunately, MI6 has been notably engaging in information warfare for the last three years against the EU based on the fact that the credible information was inconvenient and damaging to the FIVE EYES alliance. And it is very true that the credible information is damaging to the FIVE EYES alliance, but apparently MI6 was completely unaware that Canada was part of this information dissemination from the EU. This is a major data point in the future for the FIVE EYES alliance, because current political realities are making some FIVE EYES states more aligned with the EU than with the FIVE EYES. If this drift continues much longer, the entire FIVE EYES alliance will collapse from a lack of cooperation.

For decades, FIVE EYES states have been assisting other member states in domestic law enforcement activities. This is a massive mission creep from the original goals of military and national security intelligence, not policing. However, the current drifting apart of FIVE EYES is reducing this mission creep, which is causing much less law enforcement cooperation between the member states. Over the last few decades, there have been more than a few intelligence analysts in the CIA, MI6 and CSIS that have been uncomfortable with the domestic law enforcement use of FIVE EYES resources. The biggest name among these discontents is Edward Snowden. His massive disclosures of classified information is still proving to be a headache for the FIVE EYES alliance, even twelve years later. But Snowden is only the face and icon of a legion of dissenters that for the most part keep their heads down and follow orders. It's very rare in the signals intelligence community for someone to destroy their own career by releasing top secret information. But it shows a quiet and background groundswell of discomfort in the FIVE EYES ranks in using national security intelligence for domestic law enforcement and policing.

In the age of AI, it's easy for intelligence analysts to think they can introduce unauthentic data into a report or dossier, and this makes the forensic skills of a computer scientist all the more valuable. AI might be able to create convincing video or other content, but it lacks the authentication metadata that real world content would generate. The United States seems especially overconfident in its ability to bluff other world states with the aid of AI. This is extremely misguided, since this puts the onus for verification on computer scientists and software engineers. The United States has been lagging behind in math and science in their education system for decades, and almost all other world states are better equipped than the United States to compete in AI cyberwarfare. The United States has been dependent on immigrants, especially from India, for their software engineering and computer science skills. With the Trump administration's crackdown on any and all immigration – even highly skilled immigration – it significantly weakens an already shaky software skills pool in the United States. The flip side is that Canada and the UK, and even Australia, will be more than happy to import the computer scientists that the US turns away. In that scenario, the other four FIVE EYES states will be more self sufficient in their signals intelligence, and their need and dependence on on the United States will be significantly reduced. It could even possibly be reduced to zero if the policy positions of the United States continue to diverge far to the right of the world state consensus.

The United States has invested tens of trillions of dollars in both public and private monies to further the dominance of the US technology industries, and that investment has paid off in that Apple, Amazon, Google, Microsoft and Meta are the largest technology companies in the world, and when there is ever a dispute in matters of State secrets and foreign intelligence, these American companies will always, ALWAYS side with the US Government. The problem for these massive technology companies becomes that as states around the world are more willing to use their courts to punish the American government, the major American technology companies will be left on the hook. Google stores more foreign intelligence data on its systems than any other entity in the world – even the US government itself – and when external state courts start demanding this data to prosecute the United States itself in its sovereign courts, Google will be screwed. They can fail to comply, and possibly be banned from that country's internet services. If they do comply, they will then be held complicit in American crimes against humanity. Once the alliances and agreements of former American allies fall by the wayside, the American technology sector will spectacularly collapse under its own weight. In that scenario, all that United States investment of tens of trillions of dollars in their own technology industry will be reduced to worthless, all undone because the United States could not sustain their functional democracy and instead became a state that destroyed all of its own alliances and isolated itself among world states.

The UK is more economically dependent on the United States than it has been in past decades, because of Brexit, and Donald Trump's love of tariffs puts the UK in a no-win situation since they have to capitulate to the USA – they have no economic protection with the EU. Canada is clearly getting direct intelligence dossiers from Finland, and at this point it seems most probable that Canada is the only FIVE EYES country engaged in this level of cooperation with the EU. Like has been mentioned, it is only recently that MI6 has even acknowledged non FIVE EYES cooperation, and before that MI6 was actively engaging in information sabotage against the EU. The different FIVE EYES intelligence agents of the various member states still seem inclined to believe their own intel rather than verify its accuracy with the EU, even in the case of Canada. In situations that directly affect European security, that can be a very costly mistake. The UK is trying to walk a tightrope of both appeasing the Trump administration and showing support for the European Union, and isn't succeeding very well at this high wire act. In fact this is a no-win situation for MI6. Donald Trump is not at all a diplomatic or reliable head of state, and he bases his decisions on perceived slights and offenses, and rarely does he make decisions for the ultimate good of the United States, let alone for the good of the FIVE EYES alliance. MI6 is never going to succeed under these conditions, and the top brass at MI6 should know this by now.

The historical complicity between the CIA and the UK's MI6 and Canada's CSIS is causing moral pains in the FIVE EYES alliance. The UK and Canada especially don't want to get involved in more human rights violations that will further tarnish their images in the eyes of their domestic voters. Canada and the UK are still suffering fallout from human rights violations in the 1950s and 1960 that were initiated by the CIA, and other FIVE EYES member are left holding the bag. The American courts and judicial system refuses to hold the US federal government agencies accountable for a mountain for historical crimes and human rights violations, and they continue to defer to the agencies themselves. However, both the other four FIVE EYES members as well as states across the European Union and the world are casting a very suspicious eye on American actions, and these courts that are external to the US have shown an increasing degree of comfort and acceptance at using their own court systems to prosecute Americans and United States agencies. I have experienced this first hand, because I have personally used the Finland courts and judicial system to attempt to hold the United States government accountable. It didn't work out as I had originally planned, because the United States Department of State was so unwilling to allow themselves and their sibling cabinet agencies to be prosecuted and exposed in a foreign court that they completed covered up the very existence of the basis of these court proceedings in Finland. However, first and foremost, these efforts I made are a blue print for targeting the United States government in foreign courts. The US doesn't have the resources to defend themselves in these kind of entrapment schemes if too many of them occur. Secondly, MI6's hostility to evidence surrounding these entrapment schemes in Finland and their attempts at information sabotage regarding these events put them directly on a crash course with the rest of the FIVE EYES alliance. One would hope that MI6 would recognize the direction FIVE EYES is heading and make necessary course corrections. Recent events have indicated that MI6 does in fact sense which way the wind blows, and is adjusting accordingly. Time will tell. Finally, the leverage against the United States government and its intelligence and law enforcement communities that is the result of the entrapment schemes in Finland have proven to be such a sore subject for the US that it both refuses to acknowledge the existence of this leverage while simultaneously engaging in information warfare and evidence sabotage, which completely undercuts the validity of their denial of the leverage. This leverage has the potential to be the undoing of the United State government, based on that. In the short term, American overconfidence and bravado prevent the various US agencies from recognizing that they are being pushed to the margins of the world by both the FIVE EYES states and almost all of the rest of the world. In the long term however, the US will wake up one day and find itself without a single ally and completely isolated from the rest of the world.

Foreword:

This report was published from a farm on the outskirts of Petalax, Finland on May 20th 2020. The COVID19 pandemic was only a few months along, but this report was an attempt to predict the final outcome of the pandemic and the ways in which the global unrest that was triggered by it could be exploited.

Little did anyone know the extent of the havoc and destruction it would cause. This report was clearly very embarrassing and angering to the American intelligence community, and their lashing out at this report set in motion a chain of events that is still reverberating around the world today. Less than a month later, on June 9th 2020, a massive army of both American and Finland agents stormed this little farm in Petalax, Finland and tore the place apart. After that, they kidnapped the four minor children that were living there. Two of those kidnapped children are still held captive today.

The aftermath of this invasion and kidnapping lead to further escalations between the author of this report and the American intelligence community. Caught in the middle of this little war was the Republic of Finland. Over the course of the next two years, there were two more violent raids carried out, and ultimately the author of this report conspired with the government of Finland to entrap the American intelligence community and lay bare their corruption, knavery and dishonor.

And entrapped, they were. Even as of this writing, the leverage of those entrapment operations are bearing fruit to the ones who hold the evidence of these events, as a guillotine blade hovering over the heads of the entire American law enforcement and intelligence communities. These entities have found it convenient to bribe news reporters and press agents in the English speaking world and concoct false narratives would the truth and facts of these events, in an all-out effort to maintain their cover-ups that were engineered in the aftermath of these events. It is rather amusing when I hear news reporters parroting the US government talking points in security matters, because as someone who knows the truth, it becomes very easy to see the formula that is used for spin doctoring and propaganda to ensure that only the official US viewpoint is heard by the public at large.

This “Post-Pandemic report” has turned out to be a prophetic peek in the future, and the exact formula for grabbing America by the proverbial balls has been implemented. Almost everyone in the American law enforcement and intelligence communities denies the very existence of this leverage, and the facts surrounding the events. That is under the orders of their chains of command, and obviously a select few people at the top know fully well that their subordinates are operating in the dark and completely blind. But the top brass doesn’t have their necks in the guillotine, it is the ground soldiers that do. And it is always that ground soldiers, the cannon fodder, the pawns, that must suffer and die to protect the secrets of the top brass. Someone, somewhere coined the phrase “fuck around and find out” and sometimes the truth is really that simple. The pawns in the law enforcement and intelligence communities have had ample anecdotal evidence pass before their eyes, that if they possessed even a basic level of cognitive ability, they would have figured out by now that the talking points and directives from their chain of command don’t pass the smell test. Unfortunately, almost all of these groups of people can’t see the truth staring them in the face. If it was a snake, it would have bit them. Many times over.

Report on American counterintelligence efforts and activities and chain-of-command weaknesses

October 30th 2025

As has been alluded to by many previous documents and dossiers, my efforts and credentials in the arena of international espionage are long and sundry. It is with great amusement that I watch the American law enforcement community show off their feeble minds because they just can not wrap their heads around the fact that have established myself as a free agent espionage shop, with an army of one.

With that preamble out of the way, let me summarize the situation in American counterintelligence efforts: there are too many agencies operating too many schemes with too little central oversight as to whether their operations are actually serving the American national security interests. There is especially way too much autonomy in the CIA and Department of Defense to plan and execute foreign operations under the banner of counterintelligence, with almost no oversight as to whether their plans will backfire and create more unintended consequences than anything that could have possibly been gained.

Almost all counterintelligence operations executed by the FBI, CIA or Pentagon are built on decades-old playbooks, and there has been almost no reevaluations as to whether those foundational instruction manuals even make sense anymore in the age of AI. The central themes of infiltration and organization made sense to somebody in 1950, but the world doesn't work that way anymore, and these strategies are beginning to become more harmful than helpful. Having a centralized approval process for conducting counterintelligence operations would greatly reduce what has now become in 2025 an American intelligence circular firing squad.

The liberal democrats in Congress are of course loathe to enact these changes, because they've spent decades building their systems of liberal financial nepotism and international crony capitalism. Democrats have spent the last 80 years building a global financial network that rewards liberal American viewpoints on the international stage – either with bribery or the muzzle of a gun – and they are recalcitrant to give that up or alter it now, since it lines their pockets so well. And this is precisely why these old guards much be abolished and dismantled. Quite simply, right now the America counterintelligence community is rife with corruption and mismanagement. Having a centralized oversight office under the Director of National Intelligence would massively reduce waste, corruption, mismanagement and the proverbial circular firing squads.

On American soil, the FBI and Homeland Security engage in counterintelligence operations and efforts that are based on very outdated ideas. More specifically, the idea that there is a law enforcement mandate to countering international espionage. The very idea is actually rather foolish, but in the age of AI that foolishness has become more pronounced. International cooperation and diplomatic immunity credentials grant many foreign entities exemptions from law enforcement jurisdiction anyway, and so generally speaking only the states labeled America's enemies would even see any attempts at using law enforcement. One of the big problems with that mindset is that, exactly who is America's enemy changes with the political winds and the flavors of the day. An enemy of yesteryear might now be a close ally, and after another USA election cycle might become an enemy again.

Using law enforcement in counterintelligence exacerbates the corruption and tendency towards circular firing squads, because law enforcement entities have the mindset of JUSTICE rather than the mindset of DIPLOMACY. In the realm of international espionage, diplomacy is more important that justice. Because if the USA uses its law enforcement prerogatives to harass a foreign agent, that foreign state can then in turn use its own law enforcement prerogatives to harass American citizens outside of the borders of American jurisdiction. It's always best to leave international espionage to the professionals, to the ones most trained on such delicate matters. And the Director of National Intelligence is more equipped to manage those decisions than any other federal agency.

My efforts to collaborate with the various agencies of the Republic of Finland in an effort to entrap the American law enforcement community in the planning and execution of a federal operation are the subject of several reports I have previously published, and for the sake of brevity I'm not going to include them in this report. However, the point must be emphatically made that none of these anti-American law enforcement sting operations I created in foreign countries would have been possible – at least most likely – if there had been centralized oversight as to whether these federal agency activities even made sense. The Republic of Finland now has thousands of hours of video, tens of thousands of hours of audio recordings, and hundreds of thousands of pages of documents detailing exactly how American counterintelligence operations are planned, how operatives infiltrate, and how the entire execution of the operation is conducted. This is a gift I have given Finland that keeps giving, because with this leverage, and the fact that I am the central figure behind it, I can operate with impunity. If anything ever happens to me, Finland will release treasure troves of damaging data to the European press, and at that point America's credibility won't be worth anything. Anything at all.

This situation could easily be repeated by somebody else, and create another pressure point on the American intelligence community. Maybe the next person that lays a sting operation against the American intelligence community won't be nearly as kind and tolerant as I have been. These kind of entrapment scenarios could be more easily avoided if there was a more centralized oversight structure that efficiently directs resources where it really matters, and not to pursue the hurt feelings of a bureaucrat or the financial interests of a liberal capitalist.
